Learning from wish-fulfilment films

Hollywood has long been obsessed with wish fulfilment films. In vogue in the 80s, they have returned with the release of the film Downsizing. This old fantasy puts us in the place of the protagonist and allows us to live through their adventure –all from the safety of the cinema.

But why this resurgence of wish-fulfilment films now? Millennials may have the answer. Millennials rightly feel they have inherited a very different world to that left to their parents by their grandparents. There is growing collective concern that, as a species, we are behaving in ways that the planet cannot sustain. In that context, wish fulfilment movies can be pure escapism but they can also tap into a desire we all have to take more personal risk and imagine ways of reinventing ourselves.

In the film the protagonist re-evaluates his notion of happiness after he's had his wish granted. Most of us change our ideas of what makes us happy as time goes on. Downsizing also explores the idea of living in the moment. If a film can make people think about living now, appreciating things, spreading those happy feelings, it not only makes them happier, it makes the world a better place. Some wish-fulfilment movies, like Downsizing, dig deeper, asking if altruism is the key. This may be the answer in real life.

So, these movies aren't just entertainment. They may also have the power to change your personal perspective. We can all learn from the genre.

How parents tackle bedtime around the world

While researching children's sleep across the globe, clinical psychologist Jodi Mindell was surprised to discover significant differences in bedtimes for infants and toddlers based on where they lived. The researchers found that parents in Hong Kong reported the latest bedtimes, about 10:17 p.m., whereas the earliest bedtimes were reported in New Zealand: around 7:28 p.m.

Bedtimes also appear to vary across European countries. The most dramatic contrast was in the Netherlands, where babies and young children are put to bed at around 6:30 or 7p.m. and expected to sleep through the night in their own bed, often alone in their own room.

On the other hand, in preindustrial societies like Kenya, babies were always in close proximity to caretakers, generally their mother or an older sibling, and they slept anywhere and any time. In Korea, parents often sleep with their babies.

Most families include in their child's bedtime routine, for up to 3 year-olds, some type of feeding, whether it's breastfeeding or bottle-feeding, and that's consistent across all countries, but apart from this, there are big differences in activities like bathing. In the US, 60% of families have a bath as part of their bedtime routine. It's even higher in the UK at 81%. But somewhere like India, only 13%. They are typically bathed in the morning or at another time of the day.

In the Philippines and Indonesia 30% of families include prayers as part of their bedtime routine, whereas in some places like Australia, only 6% do.
