YOUNG, BRITISH AND LIVING IN EUROPE.
BREXIT HAS TURNED OUR LIVES UPSIDE DOWN

After Brexit, what will it be like for British millennials, most of which voted to remain in EU, and live abroad? People aged 18 to 34 are looking beyond their homeland's borders for a future career, almost twice as much as the preceding generation. Cities such as Berlin have gained a reputation for their lively atmosphere and low cost of living (appealing prospects in comparison to UK cities, where millennials are hit hardest by the recession). Start-up companies are inherently international because of their need for funding and talent regardless of its origin -so knowledge of the local language is generally not required. It's extremely common for business to be conducted in English.

Since the Brexit referendum, there has been a level of uncertainty, and a state of anxiety. And the young are likely to be disproportionately affected, as their world is turned upside down right at the start of their careers. They feel helpless about the escalating incidences of xenophobia and homophobia back home.

We were told that our twenties are for exploration and learning -and most pertinently, for not yet having to make serious, long-term commitments. Yet this is exactly what Brexit is forcing on young Britons prematurely. For British people living in Spain, for instance, Brexit is a cloud over the sun.

It is not just a practical difficulty, but an emotional one. Those who had planned for only a temporary residence in a foreign country are now considering EU citizenship. However, in certain member states, such as Austria, dual citizenship is either highly restricted or forbidden -causing the applicant some complicated distress.

JON BON JOVI EMPOWERS THOSE IN NEED

Behind the music, Grammy award-winning entertainer Jon Bon Jovi is on a mission to feed and empower those in need. His strategy is simple: "One soul at a time."

With his non-profit Jon Bon Jovi Soul Foundation, based in Philadelphia, the artist is fighting poverty with direct action. According to the nonprofit's website, the Jon Bon Jovi Soul Foundation has helped provide more than 500 affordable homes to those in need across 10 states. Bon Jovi also founded the JBJ Soul Kitchen, a community restaurant that serves everyone regardless of their ability to pay. At a glance, it looks like a trendy New Jersey restaurant. There are linen napkins, fresh flowers at each place setting and a farm-to-table menu. But each meal offers one essential ingredient: hope.

"The key to our success is empowering the individual," Bon Jovi says. "We have created what we now call a pay it forward model." In-need customers volunteer their time assisting with day-to-day restaurant tasks, which pays for their own meal as well as the bill for their family. Also, paying customers are requested to buy a pay it forward card. You do not only pay for your meal, but also the one next to you, Bon Jovi says. For restaurant volunteer Moe Keane, it is this principle that makes the JBJ Soul Kitchen one of her preferred ways to give back. "You don't know if someone is dining here because they are in need, that's what's nice about it. Everyone is treated the same."
